Be Ready to Apply for Grants

- Grant readiness is much more than being ready to receive and cash a check.
- True grant readiness requires:
 - the right people - e.g., grant writer, grant manager, program staff, leadership, board connections, development staff
 - the right resources – e.g., fundable programs, collaborative partners, community support
 - the right systems – e.g., data collection & evaluation, financial management
 - the right timing – e.g., time to find grant opportunities, time to build relationships, time to develop proposals, time to track expenditure of awarded funds, time to run the programs

Be Ready to Apply for Grants

The minimum questions you should consider:

- Why are we interested in grant funding, specifically federal grants?
- Does applying to a federal grant opportunity make the most sense for our organization for this program at this specific time?
- Do we have the time, energy, and resources needed to develop strong grant proposals?
- When will we start working on seeking federal grants?

Become a Grant Reader/Reviewer to Better Understand Grants

- Reading grants helps you understand grants
 - their structure/format
 - how organizations/individuals share their story of impact
- When you participate in a group review process, you can learn what other people pay attention to in reviewing grants. In turn, you can learn what info pieces to highlight in your own proposals in the future.
- Federal government agencies also have opportunities, but you may need to meet industry-specific experience requirement.

What is my organization's role?

- First-Time Federal Grant Applicant
 - Is this the best role for your organization right now?
 - If yes, why? Document the reason so you know your why.
 - If no, why not? Document the reason, then determine what role is appropriate.
 - Should you instead be a subgrantee or collaborator for an anchor institution?
- “Seasoned” Applicant and/or Successful Federal Grant Recipient
 - How will you engage new partners and grassroots organizations to strengthen your proposal and give them opportunities to participate?

Applying & Receiving Feedback

- Preparing an application that others will understand
 - Build in time in your process to have persons not as familiar with your program or organization, review and give feedback.
 - Many funders use review committees to select recipients. Does your proposal use jargon and acronyms that only those in your field or even only within your organization understand?
- Getting feedback after a decline
 - If your proposal is unsuccessful, feedback can be the game changer for the next time.
 - If you can get direct feedback on your proposal, seek it out as tool for improvement.
 - If there is opportunity to obtain the proposal or summary of successful applicants, use these as insight to what the funder values.
